

The Mighty One

The Mighty One

From the wilds he came, to pasture and plow,
cutting and culling, is here in the now,
the market, the market, he must surely know,
on the morrow, does the mighty one go.

It is wished that meanings and interpretations derived from “The Mighty One”, be timeless, unique and as varied as those who find it necessary to ponder such things. However, I think it prudent to share the thoughts and concerns compelling the authoring of “The Mighty One”.

First stanza:

[From the wilds he came, to pasture and plow,]

Author’s import--- From a state of individual rugged natural self-reliance to political societies reliant upon institutions of governance.

Second stanza:

[cutting and culling, is here in the now,]

Author’s import--- Classification & segregation of individuals and social groups according to desired or undesired characteristics are currently under way (herd thinkers and integrative thinkers, respectively). Further implications being, the ownership of others, in that People are being managed/governed as if they are fungible assets/property.

Third and fourth stanzas:

[the market, the market, he must surely know,]

[on the morrow, does the mighty one go.]

Author’s import--- The imminence of democidal/genocidal extermination should be obvious to any attentive Independent/Free/Integrative thinker, necessitating immediate action.
